Charles S. Kraszewski

When Erin Brockovich gets involved, you know it's serious. 'You're going to be told it's safe, you're going to be told not to worry', Brockovich told the residents of East Palestine, Ohio, on the evening of 24 February 2023. She was speaking about a recent train wreck in their town, which contaminated the area with toxic chemicals. Later in the crisis, government officials decided to burn off the residue of the spill — five railroad cars worth of nasty business — thus releasing the poison into the air above the evacuated town in the American Midwest. 'That's just rubbish', she continued, referring to those governmental assurances, 'because you're going to worry [...] Don't expect somebody to give you the answers. Unfortunately, this is not a quick fix. This is going to be a long game'.<sup>1</sup> I am not making light of a tragedy that has disrupted the lives of many innocent families, nor am I belittling the importance of an environmental activist. Far from it. To make plain what I'm driving at, I need to set this in the context of another environmental tragedy.

On 26 April 1986 — and so, thirty-seven years before the East Palestine incident — the Chernobyl power plant melted down and exploded in the most infamous nuclear accident the world had ever seen to that date, releasing radioactive poison into the atmosphere, and potentially contaminating half of Europe. 'Most infamous' now, but had the Soviet government of the time had their way, we would never have heard of it, or, at most, it would have been reduced to a nefarious rumour, easy to deny by a totalitarian government adept at screwing down the lid tightly over bad news. If not for the Swedish nuclear authorities catching a whiff of unusual radiation levels in the atmosphere, and then confronting the Russians with their discovery, threatening to reveal the news if Russia refused to herself, people from Pripyat to Vladivostok, and westwards to Lisbon, would have gone on living their lives without the least notion that anything potentially dangerous might fall from the heavens onto the fields of leafy vegetables they were shortly to consume.

I was in Poland at the time, and although I was a rather faithful reader of the local newspapers — such as they were — like the Echo Krakowa and the Dziennik Polski, it was from a cabbie in Warsaw, where my wife and I happened to be, organising visas to Brussels at the West German and Belgian embassies, that we heard of the event. This must have been three days after the explosion, for in an old diary I see that I have written under 28 April: 'Nuclear eruption (emergency) in the Ukraine. Norway, Sweden and Poland covered with the Cloud. Veggies must be washed, milk not too safe'. And that's it. On the ill-fated day itself, I find that I 'spent 2 fruitless hours trying to buy tickets to movie Amadeus (in front of Wolność and Kijów)' — i.e. standing in queues in front of the sold-out cinemas where it was running, and after that, I have nothing noted down until 3 May when I wrote that our dog was bitten by a neighbour's dog at my in-laws.

I can't say for sure when the official media, controlled at the time by the Communist régime, finally revealed to the population at large what had happened on the territory of the none-too-benevolent hegemon to the East, before whom they genuflected as a matter of course. I can say that the man responsible for bringing the news to the Polish nation, the Party's press officer, Jerzy Urban, himself admitted in a 2019 interview<sup>2</sup> that it was Radio Free Europe that first broadcast the news, which had been suppressed by the Polish Communist authorities — according to Urban, 'so as not to ignite an [unnecessary] panic'.

In that same interview, Urban mentions the threat posed by radiation to milk, and how because of the relative amounts of grass ingested by cows and goats, goats' milk was the safer option. What he doesn't mention is what I remember him saying on the official televised news in early May — again, a Communist Party official speaking on Communist-controlled media — responding to an offer by the Americans to donate so many tonnes of safe powdered milk for the children of Poland. Poland — or rather, the Communist régime that controlled Poland — had refused the offer, he said, because that milk was 'politically contaminated'. Yes. That's right. Urban and the Reds would rather have Polish children drink good, honest (potentially radioactive) 'Communist' milk (be it from goats or cows) than safe, nutritious, powdered milk, lest the Poles ever get the idea that anything coming from the corrupt capitalist world might be beneficial.

Of course, this wasn't the first time that politics had the last word over common sense. In 1947, for example, 'the Soviet Union [...] told Poland to refuse Marshall aid',<sup>3</sup> which cut off the one Allied nation that could have made the best use out of the money that set an enemy's (Germany's!) ruined economy on the way to miraculous growth, condemning Poland to a third-world spiral from which it would not emerge until six decades later.<sup>4</sup> The fact that 'Ronald Reagan's milk' might save children's lives was not as important to the Communists as the fact that Ronald Reagan had ulterior political motives

<sup>3</sup> Jan Zamoyski, The Polish Way (London: John Murray, 1987), p. 376. While the United States was pouring money into rebuilding the economies of Western Europe, Stalin's USSR was milking its satellites of what little goods they had. In the case of Poland, Zamoyski goes on to state that 'at a conservative estimate, some 5,000 million dollars' worth of Polish coal was given away free to the Soviet Union between 1946 and 1955, at a time when coal was virtually Poland's only means of acquiring much-needed foreign currency'.

<sup>4</sup> Czechoslovakia was no exception here. In an about-face worthy of the pen of Hašek, in 1947 the Czechoslovak government first accepted, and later rejected, the Marshall Plan (the European Recovery Programme) 'under direct Soviet pressure' (Eugene K. Keefe, et al. Area Handbook for Czechoslovakia [Washington: Foreign Area Studies, Government Printing Office, 1972], p. 46. And this was before the Communist Machtergreifung of 1948. Petr Jokeš sums up the situation in Czechoslovakia: 'An important step was taken [...] in 1947, when the USA proposed to the nations of Europe the famous project for economic recovery known as the Marshall Plan. In Czechoslovakia, as well as in Poland, after all, Stalin was permitted the last word — and he gave a resounding nyet. Jan Masaryk, the son of the deceased President Masaryk and popular minister of foreign affairs, upon returning from Moscow where the dictator's decision was announced to him, stated that he had travelled there as a representative of an independent state, and returned as Stalin's slave'. Petr Jokeš, Czesi: Przewodnik po historii narodu i państwa (Kraków: Avalon, 2020), pp. 350–351.

for making the offer. And then — cynical as usual — Urban made a ‘generous counter-offer’ to the Americans. Poland, he said, was willing to send a transport of sleeping bags to keep the numerous homeless people on New York streets warm at night.<sup>5</sup>

I’m not qualified to speak of the threats posed by nuclear melt-downs hundreds of miles away, or what levels of radiation are harmful, or safe, to people and animals affected by exposure to radioactive fallout for longer or shorter periods of time. I’ve also never been in a position of such authority that would make me pause and wonder — Is it in the public interest to announce something that might cause a panic? I must be honest enough to admit that what I reflectively assume to be the perfidy of a Communist government willing to expose the population they oversee to danger, just so as to cover up the truth of their own ineptitude, might well be the prudence of a Creon such as I praise in the opening scenes of Oedipus Rex. ‘Shouldn’t we go inside and discuss this first?’ says Creon to his impetuous nephew / brother-in-law when the latter says ‘Speak! Tell us what the oracle said!’ upon his very public return from Delos, in the presence of the common people gathered before the palace. But the reason I’m recalling these two events, separated by almost four decades, is that they more than adequately illustrate the difference between an open, Western society, and a neurotic, paternalistic totalitarian régime from the East. The chemical accident in New Palestine was in the news as soon as it happened — CNN doesn’t give a damn about whether or not ‘Breaking News’ will cause a panic — the Polish Communist government waited several days before they admitted what had happened in Chernobyl to a population that, by and large, had already learned of the catastrophe through the grapevine. The governmental response to the accident in Ohio was immediate, even if it was criticised by others as bumbling or inadequate; the Communist response to the Chernobyl disaster was first to sweep it under the rug. In that 2019 interview with Jerzy Urban, we learn that when the Polish government finally got through to Moscow with questions, seeking guidance, the Soviets said ‘yes, there is a spike in radiation; it might be coming from us, and then again it might not’(!) And finally, to get back to Erin Brockovich, the response to the aftermath of the recent catastrophe — overlooking here those who used New Palestine for their own political ends, such as a former President of the United States who visited the area just to use it as a stick with which to whack the current administration — comes from below: private individuals, an environmental activist without any sort of official portfolio, pointing her finger at the officials we look to for help, and at their own obfuscating Jerzy Urbans. There may be Erin Brockovics in totalitarian societies as well, but a) their protests will go unreported, or b) when we do hear about them, we learn that they have been arrested and imprisoned. In Communist Poland, Erin Brockovich’s name was Anna Walentynowicz; not long ago in Putin’s Russia it was Aleksei Navalny. And there are thousands of others we’ve never heard of.

This is the context in which I can’t help but read Karel Věselý’s absurd novel *Fu(*n*)k Bomb*. The whole premise of the work — a funk group created by order of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of Czechoslovakia in order to get people smiling again? To foster a ‘new Socialist revolution’? — is in the best traditions of Czech absurd humour, stretching from Havlíček-Borovský and Hašek through Havel and Kohout. But it is also a painful reminder of what Central Europe was like under the radioactive cloud of that train-wreck known as Communism, which hung over the area from 1945 until 1989: ineffective, often absurd solutions to real problems were decided by a handful of old men in a room, while spontaneous responses to the same problems — arising from the so-called dissident sphere — were ignored, mocked, and whenever possible, quashed by the powers-that-were. ‘Cinema has its pornography’, states Štrougal explaining the birth of the unlikely project, ‘with which it makes a puppet of a man by appealing to his libido, and I believe that there must exist something similar in music — a musical composition that would be capable of steering humanity in a desired direction’. Only a Communist would look to pornography as a model for social engineering.<sup>6</sup>

For sure, Madison Avenue, that very capitalist phenomenon, does this as well: from those well-known glossy photos of ice-cubes in whiskey adverts which (supposedly) attract customers to the product, subliminally, by somehow suggesting ‘sex’ with the shadows of their indentations, to the ham-handed commercials telling us ‘to be good to ourselves’ and ‘treat ourselves’ to something we ‘deserve’, be it a new car, or a vacation getaway. But those attempts at directing us affect only a narrow, specific aspect of our personality, and like the genetic superbug invented in the Bond film No Time to Die, they can infect only a certain part of the population. A teetotaller isn’t likely to be swayed to rush out and buy a litre of Scotch, sexual insinuations or no sexual insinuations,

<sup>6</sup> It is to be noted that, shortly after the fall of the Communist régime in Poland, Jerzy Urban founded a contrarian rag titled Nie! [No!], which often featured soft-porn photos of scantily-clad lovelies. Subliminal messaging, for sure: follow us, and get this; what does the ‘clero-fascist’ group that took over have to offer you? Snapshots of John Paul II?

and a person who knows that he just doesn't have the money for a new car can't be manipulated into buying a Lexus, however much he might be told that he 'deserves' one. The chilling thing about the totalitarian brainwashers is that they are determined to control — subliminally — the whole person, and every one of them, affecting his entire behaviour as a 'societal unit'.

It would be easy here to laugh at the failures of centrally-planned economies, where the projections for just how many items of a given sort are to be produced over the next five years — which, due to the fact that one cannot predict the future (COVID anyone? Russia's war on Ukraine?) often leads to an abundance of unnecessary items, and shortages of what people really need at any given moment. In a normal free market economy, such shortages are made up by entrepreneurs (missing here, officially) who see the opportunity to make money and 'give the people what they want'.<sup>7</sup> Such 'rational planning' is as much astrological voodoo as are those fantastic formulae of Jiří's father, which systematise the unsystematisable: the moods of human souls.

The logarithms of Jiří's old man are one of the driest jokes in this novel full of dry Czech humour. But the unfunny foundation that such plots are based on — horrifying and infuriating — is the paternalism of the totalitarians which can be summed up in the phrase: ‘sit quiet, we know what’s good for you’. For example, during the recording of the band’s second album Hope, Štrougal comes up with the bright idea of cramming his mobile studio into the apartment of a typical worker’s family. He wishes to capture the sounds of the daily life of a worker’s flat as sampling illustration for a musical passage illustrating the exploitation of a typical worker in a capitalist society:

This time, the idea was for the band to unpack its studio in the flat of any representative of the working class to hand, to draw inspiration from his or her unvarnished daily life for one of the songs. At first, I found the idea a little strange. But Dobrý, of course, immediately signed on and offered the family of his uncle from Polička.

Passing over the snide paradox of illustrating the daily life of a slave of capitalism by recording the daily life of a worker’s family living in the supposed utopia of Communism (Czechoslovakia, 1989), let us note Štrougal’s reaction to Jiří’s protests at the havoc (emotional and material) that the band is wrecking upon the innocent family in the name of art:

‘Comrade, what’s going on here — it’s out of bounds already’.

‘And what sort of bounds, exactly, are you referring to?’

‘We can’t simply terrorise the common people like this’!

‘No? I think we can. Our album is more important than the comfort of some worker or other...’

That made me even more angry:

‘What? I can’t believe that you’d say such a thing, Comrade... Isn’t it for the most common workers that we’re making this revolution of ours?’

‘You can’t make an omelette without breaking a few eggs. There’s nothing to be done about it. Jiří, we’re doing something great here — something, the importance of which exceeds the existence of this one family. And so they too must bow before our art’.

Of course, this attitude is as old as mankind. It is the sting in the tail of Konrad’s ‘Great Improvisation’ in Forefathers’ Eve, the monumental text of Polish Romanticism, in which the inspired bard demands ‘soul’s rule’ of God:

I want to rule as Thou dost — always, secretly:
    What I will — let them but understand,
    Do it directly, and count them blest
    With each task, and should they protest,
Then let them suffer for it, and be damned!
Let people be to me as word and thought:
    Bricks of song-structures to be willed and wrought!
    Such is, they say, Thy governance!
My mind is clear: Thou knowest I do not prate —
If Thou wouldst give me equal influence
Upon the souls of men, I would create
My nation as a living hymn —
And better scales than Thine would I employ —
Thy song is grim,
    And mine would be a hymn of joy!<sup>8</sup>

SIDE A

Intro

In the beginning was the beat, which bestowed rhythm upon the universe entire. The eruptions of suns and the multiplication of cells, the shifting of the seasons of the years, the pulsing of the hearts of living things. Whatever happens in the world is in syncopation with the primal plan. Even seeming deviations are part and parcel of the great rhythmic harmony, which sets the tempo of the spinning cosmos.

We call this perfect order ‘universal funk’, and it is the law and power that governs all matter. Without it, this universe would be mere chaos, languishing in randomness and lacking a reason to be. Everything that exists in the rhythm of funk is good. And whatever is found outside of it, quite simply, is not; is not.

When sweating bodies are writhing on a dance floor to the same rhythm, the eternal power of pulsing existence is made manifest. In the bellows of the singer, in the grind of the guitars, in the pumping of the bass, in the pounding of the drums, in the blaring of the brass there sounds the cosmic unity of the primaeval beat. The band is not playing funk, funk is playing with the band.

When everybody launches into it at once and the dancers surrender to the swing, there’s no coming back. Everyone feels himself to be under the power of the one and only groove, which when glimpsed must be instressed as something absolutely natural and necessary. Instressed, because the laws of movement encoded in the DNA of the universe cannot be coldly considered, they can only be felt.

I once went along this way, seeking to attune myself, to connect myself, to harmony. Instead of fluid motions I tripped and stutter-stepped, but my squeaks and jitters soon transformed themselves into a dance. And as I realised the most crazy variations of my two left feet, I began to feel that, suddenly, everything made sense.

Doubt was transformed into a certainty, despair to exaltation. All you needed do was listen to the beating of your heart, and be at one with it. And in this way I too became a part of the universal funk.

1. Signs of the Times (October 1988)

Sometimes I wonder if it all wasn't just a dream. A wandering of the reason, which cobbled together some fantastic, unreal events into an improbable sequence. A misfire of memory, in which real recollections mix together with fiction and leave me searching futilely for a firm foothold. But what if, after all...?

It all seems so real and palpable to me. And however sick my brain might be, I ask myself: would it have been capable of thinking up something so insane? And isn't that, after all, the one, hoped-for proof that it all really did happen?

It all began on one autumn afternoon. I was sitting in the corridor outside the President's office<sup>10</sup> and in that dim space, deeply sunk in silence, I was waiting for my time to come. The beating of my heart counted off the seconds and my eyes were sweeping over the contours of the walls. By degrees, individual items began to emerge from the gloom — heavy drapes, windows, doors, and the majestic ceiling with the relief of the State Emblem.

My recollection of that moment is so strong that I can't imagine what came before. How did I find myself there in the first place? Who was it summoned me? I remember only the brooding anxiety, the nerves that made my bowels twist, and piercing through it all, the stifled flame of anticipation and excitement of what was awaiting me. My eagerness in the face of my approaching meeting with the very head of our state. With the President himself!

What an indescribable honour for a run-of-the-mill manager of a small club on the outskirts of the capital city. Come on — people like me don't cross paths with people like him! Over here we have my tiny, meaningless existence, and over there: the life of a man before whom History sets so many crucial decisions to be taken, which he, always, unfailingly, resolves to the satisfaction of the working class.

What right had I to compare myself to him, or to follow in his footsteps ? All I dared attempt was to scrutinise the steps he took and learn from them. Up until that very moment I had never had the honour of meeting him in person, and yet I had the feeling that he had been nearby all my life long, throughout all my thirty years.

I knew my own father very little, and so it was that proud man from the portrait on the wall of my classrooms toward whom I turned my beseeching eyes. Perhaps this might sound impertinent, but it was he, indeed, who had become my surrogate father. Ever wise, ever concerned, always providing his son with a sense of security and the conviction that everything is just as it ought to be.

And now I was to meet him face to face. I was somewhat worried lest the immense esteem in which I held him should suffer at the first sight of an ageing man, who perhaps wouldn't turn out to be as sharp and omniscient as my imagination made him out to be. After all, he had just celebrated his seventy-fifth birthday, and that's an age at which you have every right to see your vitality ebb a bit, while old age begins to definitively declare its ascendancy over the flesh.

Yet my fears turned out to be completely unfounded. There in the office stood the very same man of my imaginings — the one toward whom I directed that gaze of unlimited trust. For when, at last, his secretary summoned me from the gloom of the waiting room into the well-lit space of his office — there he stood, facing the window with his back to me, his legs strongly and widely planted, his hands clasped behind him, searching with his eyes the city that spread below him through the window slightly ajar.

It was... it was a sublime sight. It seemed to me as if he were looking down upon the world entire. But just a slight shift of perspective would reveal to one's eye how the entire Party, the entire state, was resting on his broad shoulders, all of industry, heavy and light, education, the health services and agriculture, all of the happiness and good fortune of the working class, labourers, peasantry and intelligentsia; the weight of the entire nation was pressing down upon him... and yet he stood firm, upright, unbending.

'Hail to labour, Jiří', he greeted me in his firm voice. His secretary made a gesture indicating that I should step onto the runner that led to the presidential desk. According to protocol, it was I who should have greeted him first, but I had been dumbstruck with wonder at what my eyes were beholding.

'Hail to labour, Comrade President', I finally managed to squeeze out of my throat. He turned around, but I still couldn't see his face, which was covered in shadow, his form backlit by the window.

'Please, take a seat', he said, indicating a chair richly upholstered in plush red velvet. You could make out a Slovak accent in his manner of speaking, as soft as an eiderdown, and now and then a word in his mother tongue crept in.

The office was surprisingly small, though cosy. Besides the massive desk, there were high bookshelves along two walls.

'Thank you for coming, Jiří. I have a task for you'.

At last, I caught a glimpse of his face. Upon it a difficult life was etched, full of struggles and creativity. It wasn't that I perceived it in detail; I took his face as a complete whole, like an icon in which I recognised the universally familiar symbol that had led me on from the tenderest years of my childhood.

‘You have studied contemporary bourgeois music, is that right?’

‘Yes, Comrade President. My dissertation was a consideration of capitalist rock and roll. It actually earned me ex...’

He interrupted me with a gesture of his hand.

‘That’s a rather peculiar topic for the Institute of Marxist-Leninist Studies...’

He sat down at his desk and was swathed in a different refraction of the light. That face! A thousand times seen on official portraits, photographs and television screens. The same, yet different.

‘If you will permit me to disagree’, I said. ‘Karl Marx himself wrote about the role of art in the exploitation of the working class, the obscuring of their proper consciousness by the propagation of false images. Vladimir Ilyich Lenin composed a treatise on the subject, which, unfortunately, was not published during his lifetime’.

‘I know, I know, of course’, he said, directing my eyes with his own toward the gigantic wall of books. The collected works of Karl Marx stood on the highest shelf, and right beneath them, in red jackets, a compendium of Lenin with appendices. ‘Are you also familiar with our contemporary workers’ and peasants’ music?’

‘Of course. I work at the House of Culture in Kobylisy. Groups from all corners of the Republic come to perform there’.

‘And what’s your opinion of them?’

‘Not bad, you say... Look...’ He fell silent for a moment. ‘They’re not bad... So that means that they might be much better? Is that right?’

I nodded. I couldn’t think of anything better to say or do in response to that. He got up and took a step toward

About the Author

Karel Veselý (born 1976) is a Czech music journalist and writer. He studied English and Philosophy at the Faculty of Arts of the Masaryk University in Brno. Debuting in fanzines devoted to science fiction, metal and techno music, he moved into cultural journalism, which he has been his daily bread since 2008. His work has appeared in various Czech media such as Aktuálně.cz, Alarm and Full Moon, and he is a longtime collaborator with Czech Radio. His first book, Hudba ohňa [Music of Fire], a history of African-American music, was published in 2010. In 2017 he contributed to the book Planéta Nippon [Planet Nippon], dealing with Japanese pop culture, which was nominated for the Magnesia Litera award in the Non-Fiction category. In the same year, he made his debut as a novelist with Bomba Funk. In 2020, the book Všetky mačky sú šedé [All Cats are Grey, co-authored with Miloš Hroch] appeared, which maps the theme of sadness in Western popular music over the last forty years. In 2022, he published his second novel, Metal, a dystopian fiction inspired by the bleak visions of black metal music. He has also contributed to the books Kmene [Tribes], Kmene 90, Made in Japan and Fordlandia. He is a contributing screenwriter of the documentary cycle Rapstory, which plotted the history of Czech rap for Czech Television. He is the author of the podcasts Čierne slnko [Black Sun] and Rapspot. Married, with two children, he splits his time between Znojmo and Prague.

And more forthcoming . . .

*Fu(*n*)k Bomb* (original title Bomba Funk, 2010) is music critic Karel Veselý's debut novel -a "grotesque mystification" in the great Czech tradition of dry, absurd humour, from Havlíček-Borovský and Hašek to Havel and Kohout. Set on the eve of the 1989 Velvet Revolution, it playfully imagines an attempt to save Communism in Czechoslovakia through the mobilising power of funk music.

Jiří, a naive true believer working at a provincial cultural institution, is unexpectedly summoned by President Gustáv Husák, who fears the rising dissident movement. Husák unveils his oddly logical plan: win back the youth by creating a funk band inspired by "the music of oppressed Black America," combining irresistible dance rhythms with ideologically sound Socialist lyrics.

Taking on the mission, Jiří embarks on a surreal musical adventure that becomes both the project of his life and a harsh education in the realities of Party politics. Despite high-level backing, internal power struggles threaten the band's success, and the group - Funky Leninz - paradoxically finds itself pushed into a dissident role while trying to defend the status quo.

Both a witty portrait of late-1980s Prague and a loving homage to funk and Czech underground music, *Fu(*n*)k Bomb* offers a sharp, humorous commentary on Czechoslovak culture and history at the moment of its transformation.
